Great book!

This title is geared towards the 10-14 age range, but I think it works well with kids outside that range as well, such as my nearly 9 year old daughter. Even my 16- and 17-year-old sons are finding it to be interesting. Right off the bat, I have to say that we found the bright color to be appealing, without being patronizing. So many tween/teen resources out there just look like they are trying too hard, and my teens balk at giving them a real look. You can only say, "You can't judge a book by its cover" so many times. My teens have determined that Christian books that look patronizing on the outside almost always are even worse inside. So I loved that this one just looks bright and fun. In the introduction, Judah Smith tells us who he is. A 33-year-old pastor, who isn't perfect and isn't going around judging everyone else. He also talks about the "Jesus Is" campaign that they started at their church, with the idea of getting people thinking about Jesus, and how that is the mission of their church. Nothing in the introduction is remotely patronizing or condescending, and THAT gets my kids' attention. The book is split up into 15 chapters in six sections. None of the chapters is particularly long, which is wonderful for tweens. Most are in the roughly 10 pages range, with some being a bit longer, and some being a little shorter. That is something that we can read and discuss without losing them. The language is fairly casual and friendly, without being a lecture or without a whole lot of over-the-top "when you get to be my age" stuff (which my kids also hate, especially coming from anyone under about age 35). When approaching an idea like how Jesus hung out with sinners, and not just sinners, but those with a reputation for being the bad crowd, Smith is careful to distinguish a why there. He outright states that your parents might forbid you from hanging out with a certain crowd and that you have to respect that. Let me quote that paragraph: "Don't misunderstand me here. I'm not talking about hanging out with bad people because you want to do bad things, or because they are cool, or because it's exciting. I'm talking about spending time with people others usually reject because you love them and want to help them. Remember, there might be times when your parents will ask you not to hang out with certain people because they are a bad influence or they are making dangerous decisions. If that is the case, you need to trust they know what they are doing." Each chapter ends with some discussion questions, and these are questions that don't prompt a lecture. They actually promote discussion. I am very impressed with this resource.
