My Journey: A Life According To God

Synopsis

“My Journey: A Life According to God” is the first person story of God’s coming of age as the parent of humanity and what God may think of His Children’s triumphs as well as their tragedies. Part process theology, part history, and a lot of humor, the novella takes the reader through both the history of humanity and God’s growing relationship with His Children. What did God think of Cain? Of the Tower of Babel? What about the Rise of Islam, The Inquisition, and the Age of Colonization? Read along as God watches the Enlightenment and the rise of Deism and Science. What must God have thought of the World Wars? In the tradition of Theodore Parker and Martin Luther King Jr, see God’s hope that while the moral arc of history may be long, but it bends toward peace and understanding. If you’ve wondered what God might think of Man’s history, then “My Journey: A Life According to God” will both stimulate the mind and while entertaining the soul.~Tomkeefete@gmail.com

Customer Reviews

First I want to say that when a book has humor, you already have me. That is, if it’s truly humor. And this writer uses humor skillfully, yet effortlessly.

It's just there. I can sense his emotions, which is what any writer wants his reader to be able to do. So that is a great start for me in any book. Because of my own journey in and out of religion, I got him often in the book. I really liked when God addressed the whole Jesus thing, especially the parts about him poking fun at how things really went down in the New Testament and the history being pointed out in a laughable manner. The author truly knows stuff, but continues to write in parody-style, maybe to not offend some, by keeping it light. I'm not sure, but that's how it came across to me. He's truly getting at some nitty-gritty stuff, but continues to keep it light throughout, because of the consistent humor infiltrating almost every sentence, and without being redundant. The explanation of low and high Christology was great. I've always wanted to say that, but never did. I wish I had. A book that speaks from the first person as God can be risky. To make the assumption that one can know the mind of God is always considered disrespectful, to say the least. To put words into God's mouth (Proverbs 30:5-6) is also taking a chance. But overall, if you read this without a spirit of criticism, it almost provides a relief from the solemnity that religion seems to provide. There are so many little hidden nuggets within this very short story. I could read it again and again for two reasons: It takes little time to read through it and you hear something different each time. One small example is when he says we are sadly, still in the age of Pisces. And when he just goes off into modern-day references - it keeps things interesting. I recommend this book for people who pretty much know what they believe, but don't take themselves too seriously. If you're still trying to figure out what you believe, or you are so dogmatic that you can't be bothered with others' beliefs or the humor in it all, then you probably wouldn't enjoy this book.

This book is delightfully witty and mildly irreverent (in the best sense). I laughed the whole way through. Keefe's courage to narrate from the point of view of God pays off both in humor and innovative theological reflection. This book will especially delight those who have studied theology or religious history, as the inside jokes are expertly presented.

Don't be fooled by its small size and playful tone - My Journey tackles a host of thorny theological issues - from ontology to Christology - all within a warm-hearted "coming-of-age" tale that incorporates and embraces other cultures and faith traditions. Clearly well versed in history and philosophy in addition to the Judeo-Christian tradition, the author combines the irreverent humor of Christopher Moore's Lamb or Joseph Heller's God Knows with the rapid-fire scholarly references of Umberto Eco's Foucault's Pendulum.

Very insightful and refreshing view of our faith and a view towards a God that I believe is reflective of his/her true nature!
